SYNOPSIS:

Sidney Bruhl, a previously successful playwright, has had a series of box office flops and is having trouble writing. Sidney reads from a play that he tells his wife, Myra, he has received from a student of his, Clifford Anderson. Sidney says that the student's play is a certain hit. Interspersed with reassurances that he is only kidding, he frightens Myra with suggestions that he may kill Clifford in order to steal the script. Sidney telephones Clifford to invite him over to give him suggestions on improving the play. Clifford's play is, like the actual play itself, entitled Deathtrap, and is also a one set, five-character thriller. Sidney arrives back at his den, having picked up Clifford at the train station. After socializing briefly, Sidney determines that there are no other carbon copies or Xeroxes of the play in existence thus escalating the sense that he may kill Clifford. But as Myra and the audience are to find, nothing is what it seems. Even Clifford and Sidney are in for some outrageous surprises, as are next door neighbor-psychic Helga Ten Dorp and Porter, Sidney’s sharp as a tack attorney.
